SEA GOING PORKERS

"WHAT'S that you got there, Oscar," asked Grunty. "Oh, just a cigarette lighter that won't light," replied Oscar, trying unsuccessfully to get a spark of light from the gadget. "Oh well," he said finally, putting the lighter in his pocket, "I don't smoke anyhow."

"Sour grapes!" grunted Grunty, mopping his brow. "Let's go down to the waterfront and get away from this steaming heat," he suggested.

As they approached the docks, they were rewarded with a stiff breeze that was blowing up from the east. As they made their way to a jetty on which some small boats were moored, Grunty's eye caught a trim little sailboat, tied up at the end of the jetty. "Gosh!" he sighed, looking longingly at the sleek little craft. "Isn't she a beauty, Oscar?"

Grunty always had a yen for things nautical. He had a deep admiration for ships and the men who sailed them, and a burning ambition to some day go sailing the high seas himself. "Come on," he said, unable to resist the temptation. "Let's go aboard and look her over."

Without further ado, they climbed aboard, and soon felt themselves being tossed gently in the breeze. "Gee, I feel dizzy," exclaimed Oscar, grabbing hold of a rope suspended from the mast. Before they knew what had happened, the sail was unfurled and a sudden gust of wind, catching the sail, tore the boat loose from its mooring.

Oscar, who was not much of a sailor, held on to the mast for dear life. The sail filled out with the stiffening breeze and away the little boat sped, headed for the sound.

"Whee!" cried Grunty, beside himself with joy. "Look at 'er go! I'll bet she's making 50 knots an hour." Oscar, who had never been in water deeper than his bathtub, was frightened. "B-but, Grunty," he stammered, "We're going faster every minute!"

Grunty stood proudly in the bow waving his hands excitedly. "Shiver me timbers" he shouted. "She's making 75 knots or my name isn't Grunty." He looked at the trembling Oscar scornfully and boasted, "This is small stuff for an old salt like me—salt pork, that is!" Giving Oscar a resounding slap on the back, he chuckled, "That's a joke, son."

Grunty's joy was destined to be short-lived. The wind grew stronger and stronger, and soon the boat was caught up in the teeth of a small hurricane, headed straight for the open sea.

On and on swept the little sail boat, now hesitating momentarily on the crest of a high wave, and then zooming down with a swoop that caused the desperate pigs to hang on for dear life. Grunty had not bargained for anything like this, and landlubber that he was at heart, he was frightened just as much as Oscar.

A sudden lurch threw Grunty against his companion, loosening Oscar's hold on the mast and they were both swept overboard. They were caught up immediately by another wave and piled in a heap at the pilot's helm.

"Are you all right, Oscar?" Grunty yelled, trying to make himself heard above the roaring wind.

"I'm all wet, but still hanging on," yelled back Oscar. "Which way are we headed for?"

Grunty pulled himself up to the pilot's seat and peered at the instrument panel. "We're headed South by West," he shouted back, "And making 120 knots an hour. At that rate we ought to be in the South Sea Islands by morning."

Let us leave Oscar and Grunty for a moment, in their hurricane driven sail boat and look in on the island of Bongi, a tiny island, situated in the South Pacific. In a small clearing, skirting a dense jungle leading down to the shallow beach, the Bongi head hunters are in the throes of a tribal dance.

The steady beat of tom-toms fill the air, and the wild-eyed natives, attired in loin cloths are whooping it up in the clearing. Their bodies and faces are grotesquely painted and lend an air of eeriness to the grim scene.

As the drums quicken their beat, the chanting head hunters work themselves up into an awe-inspiring frenzy. Up and down they jump, waving their spears wildly and rending the air with their ear-splitting shrieks.

* * *

The hurricane had subsided, and Oscar and Grunty, unaware of what lay ahead of them, drifted in their boat onto the beach of the island. Pulling the boat up to a dry spot, they began skirting the jungle in search of food and shelter.

Suddenly, they burst upon the open clearing, where the natives were doing their Bongi version of an American jam session. Oscar was about to hail them, when Grunty slapped his hand over his mouth and pulled him back to the safety of a clump of bushes.

"Look at those babies dance," exclaimed Oscar, enthralled by the wild girations of the natives. "Gosh! I didn't know they knew how to jive in the South Sea islands!"

Grunty smirked scornfully. "Those guys are the originators of jive, stupid. What we do back home is just a poor imitation."

Oscar's hunger was beginning to get the best of him, and before Grunty could stop him, he entered the clearing and walked over to one of the natives who was resting on the ground. "How about some grub, brother?" he asked, pointing to his mouth and working his jaws to indicate he was hungry.

At the sight of the succulent pig, the wild-eyed native jumped up with a shriek, and grabbing Oscar by the hand, pulled him into the center of the clearing. Soon, the excited natives gathered around him, yelling with glee and poking their fingers into his ribs.

"They're sure glad to see me," thought Oscar to himself. His thoughts were confirmed when two huskies lugged a heavy pot into the center of the clearing and hung it on a tripod. "At last we're going to eat," thought Oscar as they placed dried kindling wood under the pot. "The least I can do is light the fire for them," he said, suddenly remembering the lighter in his pocket.

Miraculously, the lighter worked, and more miraculously, the natives, seeing the sudden flash of light from the gadget, dropped their spears and fled in terror into the jungle. "You never can tell when those darn things will work," said Grunty coming out of his hiding place and joining the bewildered Oscar. "You may not know it, Oscar," he chuckled, "But you just came mighty near stewing in your own juice."
